

Leveraging internal audit to help monitor and assess culture

Audit Committee Institute
Part of the KPMG Board Leadership Centre

As boards and audit committees sharpen their focus on corporate culture, many are turning to internal audit to help them better understand and assess the company's culture. Recognising that internal audit's skills, capabilities, and stature within the organisation will vary widely by company, the following questions should be helpful in tackling this critical and timely challenge.

Have the board and management agreed on the behaviours and values that are key to executing the strategy?

There is no one "right" culture; rather, there is a spectrum of behaviours which companies might encourage depending on their strategy. Behaviours encouraged at a disruptor company will be different than those encouraged at a heavily regulated company, and culture will need to evolve as the strategy evolves. Internal audit can help reinforce the importance of clarity regarding the desired culture and related behavioural expectations, which can then be assessed and monitored over time.

How can the board gain a better line of sight into the culture throughout the organisation?

One of the biggest challenges boards face in overseeing and assessing culture is visibility. While the tone at the top is often apparent, the culture in the middle and throughout the organisation is more difficult for boards to assess. Directors can improve visibility by visiting company facilities and engaging employees, walking the halls of headquarters and monitoring social media - and they can also turn to internal audit to deepen their understanding of what is really happening and improve their line of sight at all levels of the organisation.

Is it time for a culture dashboard?

One of the ways internal audit can help give the board better visibility and a more holistic view of culture at all levels is by taking the lead - together with the ethics and compliance and human resources functions - in developing a culture dashboard.

All three functions have data - survey results, customer satisfaction data, human resources, and employee data, as well as ethics and compliance data - which can feed into a culture dashboard and provide a snapshot of the company's culture. Similar to cyber risk dashboards, culture dashboards will evolve over time. Boards need to hold management accountable for developing an integrated picture of the organisation's culture, and a regularly updated culture dashboard can be a helpful tool and serve as the basis for management's discussions about culture with the board.

What approach to auditing culture makes sense?

In developing a culture audit approach, internal audit has several options to explore with the audit committee.

One option is to add culture considerations to existing audits - for example, by performing root cause analyses to determine whether a breakdown in procedures or controls was caused by lack of training, poor communications, or leadership style. Patterns and trends in cultural problems can be identified. Another option is to expand the audit universe to include systems that influence culture (e.g., whistleblower reporting, incentives and performance targets, training, health and safety, etc.).

A third option is to perform a stand-alone culture audit, tailored to the organisation's culture maturity and internal audit's capabilities. It is critical that auditing and measurement be continuous in order to identify trends and gaps, quickly adjust course, and avoid major cultural blind spots and failings.

A few guiding principles may be helpful as the organisation sharpens its focus on culture:

- Don't be complacent. The view at the top is often too rosy, making visibility into the middle and lower levels of the organisation vital.
- Be ready to face hard truths. Digging deeper into culture may uncover some unpleasant realities that need to be addressed.
- Dashboards can offer valuable signals, but they are not the end of the story. Be ready to dig deeper.
- Focus on behaviours, not just results - and don't let bad behaviours slide because of good results.

This article was written by Jose R Rodriguez and Tracey Keele and was originally published in the November/December 2018 issue of NACD Directorship magazine.

Jose R. Rodriguez is partner in charge and executive director of KPMG's US Audit Committee Institute

Tracey Keele is a partner in the advisory practice of KPMG LLP

Contact us

Katie Clinton

UK Head of Internal Audit, Risk & Compliance Services

T: +44 (0)161 246 4480

E: Katie.clinton@kpmg.co.uk

Timothy Copnell

Board Leadership Centre

T: +44 (0)20 7694 8082

E: tim.copnell@kpmg.co.uk

www.kpmg.com/uk/blc

The information contained herein is of a general nature and is not intended to address the circumstances of any particular individual or entity. Although we endeavor to provide accurate and timely information, there can be no guarantee that such information is accurate as of the date it is received or that it will continue to be accurate in the future. No one should act on such information without appropriate professional advice after a thorough examination of the particular situation.

© 2019 KPMG LLP, a UK limited liability partnership and a member firm of the KPMG network of independent member firms affiliated with KPMG International Cooperative ("KPMG International"), a Swiss entity. All rights reserved. Printed in the United Kingdom. The KPMG name and logo are registered trademarks or trademarks of KPMG International. Designed by CREATE | February 2018 | CRT89155